Sarah Boseley

Former Health Editor, The Guardian

Sarah Boseley is the former health editor of the Guardian. In a 37-year career at the Guardian she won a number of awards for her work on HIV/Aids in Africa, including the One World Media award (twice) and the European section of the Lorenzo Natali prize, awarded by the European commission. She received the journalism award of the European School of Oncology for cancer coverage in 2006 and was named BMJ health communicator of the year in 2010 for her work on the problems of the drug-supply chain in Africa. She is also the author of The Shape We're In: How Junk Food and Diets Are Shortening Our Lives, published by Guardian Faber. While most of her work concerns medical, scientific and health policy issues within the United Kingdom, she has broadened her focus to respond to the increasing globalization of health and the needs of developing countries. Her coverage of AIDS in Africa won a number of major awards, including the Lorenzo Natali prize of the European Commission.
